The policy starts overleaf.

1 Introduction

This policy outlines how policies are put into place, what they are and how they should be written within the DF Movement. All Policies should be made publicly available.

2 Democracy

DF Policies can be written by any member/s of:

- The DF Movement
- DF Committee
- General Council
- Venturer Committee

Policies can be amended by any member of the above groups before being accepted.

To be accepted and put into use, policies must be discussed and possibly amended at a DF thing in consensus with the attendants and then will be agreed at that or a future thing. It should be taken into account that the decision should be representative of DFs as a whole and the attendance of a thing may not provide that.

In order for a Policy to be put in place, it must be approved at a thing with an attendance of at least 5 people, including one committee member and one non-committee member.

Any person, from the above groups, wishing to discuss/suggest a policy should email secretary@spanthat.world before the agenda has been finalised for the next thing. (The agenda should be finalised approximately a fortnight before the event.)

All policies should be reviewed after 2 years.

DF policies do not need to go through Althing as a motion.

3 Writing Process

DF Policies are there to enforce the ideals of the DF movement and to inform the members how it is run. These policies should be simple and concise, informing people of what is expected of them, how they should inform others of these expectations and what will happen if there is a break in these policies.

When writing a policy, people should try to include views from a variety of perspectives and get input from people with many different experiences. This can be done using tools like google docs that allow multiple people to edit/comment on parts of the document at the same time, however other approaches have benefits that google docs cannot provide.

When writing or editing a policy, some pitfalls to look out for can be:

- Exclusionary writing
- Lengthy examples
- Jargon and buzzwords
- Containing reasoning within the policy

- Large blocks of text with no breaks
- Biased content or wording
- Unnecessarily high word count
- Overly fancy formatting

All of these and more can be issues when writing policies but there are easy solutions that can be discovered through discussion. Policies should ideally be discussed multiple times before they are put into practice, but it may be necessary or preferred for the policy to be put in place earlier than that.

Please remember that when writing a policy, the first draft will always be the worst, get it all on the page and improve it later, all of these policies go through editing continuously and will be changed as the organisation changes. If you want to write a policy find a place to start and write something, even if it's not good yet.
